

I would like to sincerely express my gratitude to the Anglo-Thai society for this Educational Award. I am privileged to receive this award which reassures me of the significance of my research and presents a huge achievement of my PhD study.

Because Thai graduate students and novice scholars usually find the task of writing research papers daunting, my research aims to raise their awareness and enhance knowledge and strategies regarding research paper writing and journal publication. The research demonstrates a powerful combination of genre-based analysis and corpus-based approach to identify the crucial elements to be included in research articles. The body of knowledge is of paramount importance, preparing Thai scholars in general and graduate students in particular, to be aware of certain expectations of the journals and to conform to the proclivities of the target discourse using the conventional syntactic constructions and linguistic features. The knowledge could serve these people's needs to draft their manuscript effectively, or at least to familiarise themselves with how research articles are constructed rhetorically and linguistically. It is believed that the findings could enhance opportunities of having research work published in the journals to be successful in participation in international forum.

I have greatly appreciated the wise guidance and supervision of Dr Sue Wharton who always expresses her keen sensitivity to the topic and helps me crystalize my research ideas. Her constructive feedback and comments have motivated and, at the same time, challenged me to strive for excellence. I am also pleased to acknowledge the financial support of the Royal Thai government, and emotional support and encouragement from my family. Without these people, I could not have come this far.
